Should wild animals be kept in zoos? believe Many people think animals should be kept in zoos, but if you really think about it, it can be quite upsetting for the animals, although they have a lot to offer. Carry on reading for more information! Many zoos do actually help people with research and photography, people do come with some very good photos with animals. Such as, tigers, penguins, wild birds and many, many more. But, Although, zoos can help with research and photography, not all zoos are equal, due to the location and communication with the staff members. Even though, staff members try their best to help any animals in their care, there's better than they they possibly would in the wild. Not all animals are able to thrive better than they would in the wild due to, not having enough money to buy food, water, and many more things to help them thrive the best they possibly would. Animals do get very bored and disinterested in life and miss hunting in their natural habitat and surroundings and could ^{that} lead to could ^{that} lead to self-harm. Would you really want the animals to be disinterested in life, and who knows, that could even lead to self-harm one ^{one} due to depression?

 Yes zoos can help with photography, but at Zoos you can't always get good enough photos with huge metal bars in the way blocking your beautiful view. But on the other hand, why not travel to the wild and see the animals in their natural habitat and surroundings up close without huge black metal bars in the way. In conclusion, yes zoos are £20 with bars in the way but why not spend £750 to travel around the world and take photos without huge metal bars in the way? So who is and isn't with me on this one?
